Today's News: Creating Co-op success stories

I admit that I will be showing my bias in writing this month's column. Of course, I am always biased in favour of Brandon University, but this one is more [...]

Reported by: brandonsun

Brandon University president David Docherty writes that in its first five years, the university's Co-op program has connected more than 100 students to meaningful and relevant work opportunities that have generated approximately $1.1 million in student salaries alone. Research shows that students with co-op experience are more likely to secure employment upon graduation, work in jobs related to their degree, and earn higher salaries. President Docherty: Co-op students are high-potential, eager to learn and bring an energy and fresh perspective to your workplace. Docherty says employers can use federal wage subsidies and provincial tax incentives to help reduce the cost of creating a job for a student. He says students appreciate the opportunity to stay connected to their employer part-time during the school year.
